ABSTRACT Introduction: Identifying the association between proinflammatory biomarkers and endothelial dysfunction has important implications for understanding the vascular changes associated with aging and risk of cardiovascular disease (CVD). A therefore, understanding how CVD biomarkers are associated with endothelial function would facilitate the development of early clinical markers of subclinical CVD. Methods: We measured circulating biomarkers related to inflammation (C-reactive protein (CRP), interleukin-6 (IL-6), intercellular adhesion molecule-1 (ICAM-1)), oxidant stress (oxidized low-density lipoprotein (oxLDL), nitric oxide (NO)), and endothelial dysfunction in 995 participants in the Gene Environment Association Studies (GENE-A) study. We used aortic pulse wave velocity as a measure of arterial stiffness and carotid intima-media thickness (IMT) as a measure of subclinical atherosclerosis. We estimated associations between each inflammatory biomarker and endothelial function using linear regression models.
