Motion capture studio engineer Seth Green and I have been working closely to create these suits for this latest iteration of the franchise. Seth and I have shared lots of challenging technical and creative conversations as we've had to find the right balance between creating the most realistic and immersive game possible and creating an experience that players can use and enjoy without having to have motion capture suits on them. In total, there are 14 key markers on each body part that are important for the data to be accurately captured and interpreted, and these key markers are precisely placed at the correct anatomical points. It's a very specific process, as there are multiple data points required to be accurate. For example, the ankle marker needs to be placed at the back and the front of the ankle, the knee at the front and back of the knee, and the forearms at the exact position where they are in the real world. As the data is sent from player's suit to the game engine for processing, the system looks for the key markers that are closest to the player's skin so it can match the data to the closest area of the player. In terms of capturing the data, if the player is wearing a suit that is too loose or too tight, the data might not be correctly matched. This is why players have to try on different suits, check the calibration of the marker, and test the games to make sure they are comfortable and can play the sport without any issues.

About three months after I started working on the project, I was able to go to a player's house to capture and test the data on-site. There, I was able to put on the player's suite and go through the motions of the action, running around, jumping, kicking, and tackling and, once I'm confident of the data, I'm able to return to the studio and do a match simulation. That's a great advantage to the studio engineer that is working closely with the players and has an idea of what works best for a player in that position. I'd like to point out that it's very important for FIFA to be realistic, and accurately simulate running and tackling. Simulation of one of the most important aspects of the game was deemed by the development team to be a priority because the controls for running are quite basic at the moment. It's one of the aspects where people tend to get stuck on when it comes to FIFA. When it comes to tackling, we had to make sure we

I've been tracking the rear end fluid for a while. I know it's not expensive because when it stops leaking I don't see any bottles. But with maintenance schedules I cannot afford to have it fail again. It's my only fear from day 1. I don't like being the one that has to order a new set. I like to play devils advocate. BMW did say they have no plans to sell any more 335i in the US market. My guess is that if there is a warranty issue with the fluid they will replace that. I just hope that it is not an expensive piece of $$ to replace. I just had mine replaced about a week ago and I am pretty happy with the process. the guy at the dealership said he normally has many orders for the fluid but then again he is probably just giving me the same price as I paid (paid about $200). I took the car into another dealer and they just wanted to charge me $450 and I had to agree that I would be the one to call the mfgr.
